Description: This large, two-and-a-half-story parsonage house is built in a Craftsman style with a rectangular ground plan on a concrete foundation. It measures 48' 11" X 29' 6". The front facade has been entirely covered and altered by an addition which connects the house to the church. Other facades have also been obscured by additions so that the only remaining open facade is on the north side facing the rear of the church. The walls are clad with rusticated concrete blocks of varying sizes and laid in a random pattern. The surface texture of each block resembles hand-hewn stone and each appears to have been formed separately and the exposed surface molded by hand. The large gable roof features wide overhangs and knee braces, vent, and stickwork in the gables. Most of the windows have been boarded up but originally were wood frame, single-pane, double-hung with concrete sills and lintels. The basement has partially above ground windows matching the main windows. The front dormer is clad with plaster and ornamental, exposed timbers. The windows of the dormer have been boarded up. The interior has been neglected and is not a part of this survey although evidence of some of the woodwork and lath-and-plaster walls remains.
